During World War I Broughton came to life briefly as a headquarters for the 185th Battalion. Soon after the soldiers moved in, the "Broughton Arms"- was destroyed by fire. After the war the remaining buildings either decayed or, in the case of some of the miners' cottages, were hauled away to Sydney or Glace Bay to be turned into private dwellings. William Harris was still working at Broughton in February 1906, and working hard. Robert wrote to him on the 18th: "Don't stick to your work too steadily, it doesn't pay. A tired man can't do it well. I find if I am fatigued and stale and force myself to it, it is only to do it over again--and that is never quite what a fresh effort is." Early in March William passed through Mulgrave on his way from Broughton to Halifax. That was the month in which Thomas Lancaster resigned, and the Broughton bubble burst. Our thanks to Robert C. Tuck of Prince Edward Island for permission to reprint this chapter from his book Gothic Dreams. The book is still available in local bookstores or from Dundurn Press, 1558 Queen St. E., Toronto, Ontario M4L 1E8. The price is $16.95 plus $1.25 postage. Our thanks as well to Ken MacKinnon, Halifax, for introducing us to William Harris's work.
